Dean Bloomfield strikes a relaxed pose as he talks about the School of Basic Medical Sciences.
School not ‘separate from community’

Medical dean asks for cooperation

BY MARY ANN DIEHL
Daily Illini Staff Writer

If comprehensive health planning is to succeed it needs the working cooperation of the public, consumers and providers of health care and the government, according to Daniel Bloomfield, dean of the School of Basic Medical Sciences.

Bloomfield has received $15,000 from a state contract with the School of Basic Medical Sciences for the organization and development of regional and sub-regional comprehensive health planning agencies.

He filed for the contract “because a medical school can no longer exist separate from the community. It must be involved in community health care,” he said.

The contract expires in February, when Bloomfield will report to the state agency suggestions on the development of comprehensive health care.

Johanna De Vries, a member of the Concerned Citizens for Community Health (CCCH) and staff member of the Adolf Meyer Zone Medical Health Clinic, said after examining the contract to draw up a regional planning group that it would not be ‘programs of reform.’

Community citizens are only concerned with one particular area of health care, but we are talking about a multi-county region. Certain phases of Champaign also included other places.”

Meeting called ‘abortive’

Sullivan called the hospital planning counsel’s meeting to select a steering committee to appoint regional and subregional health planning agencies “abortive.”

The hospital planning group was appointed by a group of citizens who told us how to run our meeting, and closed our door on us. It taught you never to hold out your hand; it’s liable to come back a stump.”

“We had a proposal we didn’t even get to voice. An alternative one was presented and jammed down the people’s throats.”

“However, this is not the end of the road. We have to look optimistically toward the selection of the regional and sub-regional health planning agencies. Such an important thing as health care.”
